

Jevay Grooms, Ph.D., is an assistant professor of economics at Howard University, where her research explores the intersection of health economics, public policy, and racial and socioeconomic disparities. With a deep commitment to addressing structural inequality through data and policy analysis, her work sheds light on issues ranging from substance use disorder treatment access and Medicaid expansion to the mental health toll of the COVID-19 pandemic. She is a research fellow at the Howard University Center on Race and Wealth and has been recognized for her thought leadership through numerous invited talks and fellowships, including with the NIH, the American Economic Association, and the Center for Financial Security.

Grooms earned her Ph.D. and M.A. in economics from the University of Florida, following a dual degree in economics and political science from Loyola Marymount University. Before joining Howard, she held academic and research appointments at the University of Washington, Pomona College, and the University of Wisconsin–Madison. Her scholarship has been published in leading journals such as Educational Researcher, The Review of Black Political Economy, and the Journal of Substance Abuse Treatment. She also contributes to public discourse through outlets like Brookings and NPR.

Beyond her research, Grooms is a dedicated educator, teaching both undergraduate and doctoral-level economics courses at Howard. She is also actively involved in mentoring and professional service, contributing to diversity initiatives in the field of economics. She is a member of numerous professional organizations including the National Economic Association, American Society of Hispanic Economists, The Sadie Collective, American Economic Association, American Society of Health Economists, Association for Public Policy Analysis & Management, Western Economic Association International, Southern Economics Association.
