

Mohamed Saliou Camara, Ph.D., is a professor of African studies at Howard University whose scholarship focuses on African political history, media and society, religion and philosophy, and international relations in Africa. He earned his Ph.D. in history from Northwestern University, where he also completed a master's degree in history, after receiving a postgraduate degree in journalism from the University of Dakar and a diploma in philosophy and history from the University of Conakry in Guinea. Before joining Howard University, Camara taught international affairs, history and communication at Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University and previously served as a lecturer and associate chair of philosophy at the University of Conakry.

Camara's research examines the political and intellectual history of Africa, with particular attention to governance, mass communication, and the relationship between politics and society in Guinea and across West Africa. He is the author of several scholarly works, including Political History of Guinea Since World War Two and Historical Dictionary of Guinea, and his research also explores African epistemology and systems of knowledge. Through his publications and academic work, Camara has contributed to interdisciplinary conversations about African political development, culture and intellectual traditions.

In addition to his research and teaching, Camara has held a variety of academic and public service roles throughout his career. Earlier in his professional life, he worked as a journalist for the national radio-television network of Guinea, a correspondent for Radio France Internationale, and a speechwriter for the Press Bureau of the presidency of the Republic of Guinea. At Howard University, he contributes to the university's mission of advancing Africa-centered scholarship and global engagement through teaching, research and mentorship.
