

Loren Saxton Coleman, Ph.D. is an associate professor and Director of Graduate Studies in the Department of Communication, Culture, and Media Studies in the School of Communications at Howard University. Coleman is a Black cultural and critical scholar of media studies, and her research critically examines how Black people engage various forms of media practices, including community media, social media, television and the Black press. In some of her recent work, Coleman explores Black resistance and resilience in the D.C. Native movement and its politics of representation. She employs cultural theories to examine the intersections of structures of race, spatiality, and media practices to investigate how Black people practice both racial and spatial justice.

Her work appears in journals, such as Social Media + Society, The Black Scholar, Howard Journal of Communication, and Journal of Intercultural Communication Research. She is the co-author of two recently published books--Mixing: Race, Higher Education, and the Case of Clyde Kennard (Univ. Of Miss. Press) and Media, Industries, Society: Diverse Foundations in Mass Communication (Routledge). Coleman earned her Doctorate in Mass Communication from the University of Georgia. She earned her master's degree from the University of Georgia, and her bachelor's degree from North Carolina State University.

She is a proud native Washingtonian, and currently lives in Northwest, Washington, D.C.
